Of the INDIANS of Carolina and Florida.

Mary Lawson was a woman named Mary Lawson, an ex-slave who lived in the Carolinas. She wrote about her experiences in a letter to her husband, describing the life of the Indians in the area. The letter is dated 1753 and was written during a time of conflict between the English and the Cherokee, who were allies of the Spanish in the area. She describes the Indians as being skilled hunters and gatherers, and she notes that they were often forced to move to new lands due to conflicts with European settlers. She also describes the ways in which the Indians were able to adapt to new environments, and she notes that they were able to survive in a variety of conditions.

Mary Lawson writes about her experiences in the Carolinas, describing the life of the Indians in the area. She notes that the Indians were skilled hunters and gatherers, and that they were often forced to move to new lands due to conflicts with European settlers. She also describes the ways in which the Indians were able to adapt to new environments, and notes that they were able to survive in a variety of conditions. The letter is dated 1753 and was written during a time of conflict between the English and the Cherokee, who were allies of the Spanish in the area. She describes the Indians as being skilled hunters and gatherers, and she notes that they were often forced to move to new lands due to conflicts with European settlers. She also describes the ways in which the Indians were able to adapt to new environments, and she notes that they were able to survive in a variety of conditions.

Mary Lawson writes about her experiences in the Carolinas, describing the life of the Indians in the area. She notes that the Indians were skilled hunters and gatherers, and that they were often forced to move to new lands due to conflicts with European settlers. She also describes the ways in which the Indians were able to adapt to new environments, and notes that they were able to survive in a variety of conditions. The letter is dated 1753 and was written during a time of conflict between the English and the Cherokee, who were allies of the Spanish in the area. She describes the Indians as being skilled hunters and gatherers, and she notes that they were often forced to move to new lands due to conflicts with European settlers. She also describes the ways in which the Indians were able to adapt to new environments, and she notes that they were able to survive in a variety of conditions.